ELECTION 2008 PREVIEW: A SURGE OF SOCIAL ISSUES

The big story for ballot propositions this year is the surge of social issues. Tax and spending issues that normally dominate initiatives and referendums are taking a back seat in November to a diverse collection of social issues, with intriguing potential spillovers onto the presidential election.

Overview

Voters in 36 states are set to decide 153 ballot propositions in November. No more signatures are being counted, so the ballot is set barring a last-minute court action. Voters faced 162 propositions in November 2004, and 204 propositions in November 2006, so this is looking to be a down year for direct democracy.

Sixty-one measures were placed on the ballot by citizen petition, 59 of them initiatives (proposed new statutes or constitutional amendments) and two referendums (proposals to repeal a law passed by the legislature). Four initiatives that had qualified for the ballot in Colorado were withdrawn by sponsors. Five measures were placed on the ballot by state commissions, and three were required by state constitutions (whether to call a constitutional convention, required every 20 years in Connecticut, Hawaii, and Illinois). The remaining 84 measures were placed on the ballot by legislatures. Continuing a trend, courts have been active in removing measures from the ballot, often because of problems in the petition process.

The 59 initiatives in November together with 9 initiatives from earlier in the year bring the annual total to 68 initiatives. There were 66 initiatives in November 2004 and November 76 initiatives in 2006, so citizen-driven activity is similar to the recent past. For the decade as a whole (2000-2008), the number of initiatives is 362, short of the record 379 for the decade 1990-1999, but still the second busiest decade since the initiative process was adopted in 1898. See IRI Report, Overview of Initiative Use, 1904-2007, at www.iandrinstitute.org for historical statistics.

This IRI report highlights key issues and provides a state-by-state list all of ballot measures. For additional nonpartisan information on ballot propositions, see www.iandrinstitute.org, Ballotpedia (www.ballotpedia.org), and the National Conference of State Legislatures (www.ncsl.org).

Headline Issues

A few propositions are likely to garner national attention because they could impact policy nationwide, or influence presidential or senate campaigns.

- Gay marriage. Gay marriage has been a hot issue since February 2004 when the supreme court of Massachusetts found a right to same-sex marriage in the state constitution. That ruling set off a backlash across the country, with citizen groups and legislatures rushing to place constitutional amendments on the ballot to head off a similar ruling by courts in their states. So far 29 of 30 propositions defining marriage as solely between one man and one woman have been approved. In 2000, before this issue exploded on the national stage, California voters approved Proposition 22, banning gay marriage, by a 61-39 margin. Because Proposition 22 was a statute rather than a constitutional amendment, however, it was vulnerable to being overturned as a violation of the state constitution. In May 2008, the Republican-dominated Supreme Court of California did just that, issuing a 4-3 ruling that the state constitution contains a fundamental "right to marry" that applies to same-sex couples. California's Proposition 8 in November is an attempt to reverse that ruling, giving voters the option to amend the state constitution this time. Arizona and Florida voters will also consider constitutional amendments banning gay marriage. For more on same-sex marriage, see Ballotwatch Report BW 2008-2, "Same-Sex Marriage: Breaking the Firewall in California?", available at www.ballotwatch.org.

Proposition 8 is important for several reasons. So far the movement to legalize gay marriage has been driven by courts, and not by the legislatures or initiatives, the more democratic parts of the government. If California voters reject Proposition 8, thereby affirming the right to gay marriage, it will be the first significant popular affirmation of the idea. Also, California has been a bellwether in the past — for tax limits, term limits, environment — and was one of the first states to approve a ban on gay marriage, so a victory in the Golden State for gay marriage supporters could position them as forward-looking, and cast their opponents as defenders of a fading world view. So far, groups for and against Proposition 8 have raised $55 million between them, apparently a record amount for a social issue.

Proposition 8 could also have an effect on the presidential campaign. Both candidates have taken a position on the measure — John McCain in support and Barack Obama opposed — but both are trying to keep it below the radar, preferring to fight for the presidency on other terrain. Conventional wisdom is that Obama will take California, but if Proposition 8 forces the candidates to spend time discussing their positions on gay marriage, it could have a significant if unpredictable effect on the dynamic of the election in other states where the race is projected to be close.

Opinion surveys in August and September show voters inclined to reject the measure by more than a 10-point margin. Since support for ballot propositions tends to drop during the course of the campaign, Proposition 8 appears to be in critical condition.

- Abortion. Abortion is one the most polarizing issues in American politics, but the law has essentially been settled since the Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision in 1974. With the replacement of liberal with conservative justices, some observers believe a majority of the Supreme Court may be prepared to reverse itself on Roe v. Wade. In order to provide a case that gives the Court an opportunity to rule on this issue, pro-life activists in Colorado and South Dakota have placed measures banning abortion on the ballot. Colorado's Amendment 48 does not mention abortion, but rather defines a "person" as a human being from the point of fertilization, and would make abortion equivalent to murder. This amendment, which contains no exceptions for rape or the health of the mother, seems too extreme to pass in Colorado.

The more interesting proposition is in South Dakota. In 2006, the state legislature passed a law banning abortion that was challenged by a referendum placed on the ballot by citizen petition. After a heated campaign that attracted interest from pro-choice and pro-life groups across the nation, voters repealed the law by a vote of 44 to 56 percent. One factor contributing to the repeal was the omission of an exception for rape and the health of the mother. Pro-life activists regrouped from that defeat and qualified an initiative for the November ballot that would ban abortion, but this time provides exceptions for rape and the health of the mother. Given the generally conservative reputation of the South Dakota electorate, the prospects for Initiated Measure 11 appear to be reasonable. This campaign will attract a variety of out-of-state organizations, and should attract the national media.

- Civil rights / affirmative action. Race is another divisive issue in American politics, and one that many people, especially political candidates would prefer not to discuss. But initiatives in Colorado and Nebraska may inject race into the national debate. The measures simply say: "The state shall not discriminate against or grant preferential treatment to any group or individual on the basis of race, sex, color, ethnicity, or national origin in the operation of public employment, public contracting, or public education.” In effect, these measures would ban many affirmative action programs and require outreach to be based on economic circumstances, residence, or other such indicators. Identical measures were approved in California (1996, 55%-45%), Washington (1998, 58%-42%), and Michigan (2006, 58%-42%). In all three campaigns, the initiatives were opposed by leaders of both political parties, and by prominent business and social leaders, yet were passed by large margins. With sizeable victories so far in liberal states, the prospects for these measures in Colorado and Nebraska appears to be good. In addition to the substantive changes in policy these initiatives would bring about in their states, large margins of victory in the face of elite opposition would provide additional evidence that the parties and other opinion leaders are out of step with the voters on this issue. Perhaps as interesting, the measures could force the presidential candidates to engage in a discussion of race, something that neither is likely to welcome, and that could have an unpredictable effect on the presidential campaign. John McCain has endorsed the Arizona measure, and Barack Obama is opposed.

Trends and Interesting Issues

- Animals. Animal rights have emerged as an actively contested political arena. Animal rights activists are promoting Proposition 2 in California, a constitutional amendment that requires minimum living space for farm animals, including calves, egg-laying hens, and pregnant pigs. Similar measures were approved by Florida voters in 2002 and Arizona voters in 2006, in both cases by large margins. Florida’s “pregnant pigs” measure has been ridiculed as an example of a frivolous constitutional amendment, but voters continue to be amenable to this agenda. Proposition 2 is more ambitious than its predecessors in including chickens, and that is likely to be the focus of the opposition campaign. Question 3 in Massachusetts would ban commercial dog racing in the state by 2010, requiring closure of two tracks. In Alaska, Ballot Measure 2 asks voters to ban aerial hunting of bears, wolves, and wolverines. In Oklahoma, animal rights supporters are on the defensive with State Question 742, which establishes a state constitutional right to hunt and fish.
- Energy. California’s Proposition 7 requires all utilities to generate 20% of their energy from renewable fuel sources by 2010, rising to 40% in 2020 and 50% by 2025. Previously, renewable energy rules in the state applied only to publicly owned utilities. Missouri has a similar measure that would require 2% of electricity to be generated from renewable sources initially, rising to 15% by 2021. The trend to require utilities to produce a minimum fraction of energy with renewable fuels began with Colorado’s Amendment 37 in 2004. The standards established by Proposition 7 would be the toughest in the nation. The fate of these measures provides a signal of the public’s mood on energy conservation in light of skyrocketing oil prices. On a related theme, California’s Proposition 10 would authorize $10 billion in borrowing for alternative fuel vehicles and renewable energy.
- Marijuana. Question 2 in Massachusetts proposes to decriminalize the use of marijuana. Possession of an ounce would be an infraction with a fine of $100. Proposition 5 in California would have a similar effect, changing possession of marijuana from a misdemeanor to an infraction. Marijuana activists have been extremely successful over the last two decades in passing measures allowing medical use of marijuana (and Michigan has another such measure on the ballot), but all efforts to legalize the drug for general use have failed, most recently with Alaska’s Measure 2 in 2004 that was rejected by 56% of voters. Historically, voters have not been receptive to the libertarian argument for liberalization. These measures try a different tactic, focusing on sanctions and the cost of enforcement.
- Land use. Land use has been a common subject of ballot propositions since the Supreme Court’s ruling in Kelo v. City of New London in 2005. Eleven eminent domain or regulatory takings propositions were decided in 2006. California voters faced two eminent domain measures in the June Primary Election, rejecting Proposition 98 that would have outlawed use of eminent domain for private purposes and also banned rent control, and approving Proposition 99, a moderate counterinitiative that prohibited the use of eminent domain to seize homes but continued to allow it to seize businesses property. The storm seems to be abating, but Nevada has a Kelo-type eminent domain measure in November that was also approved in 2006 (state law requires approval in two consecutive elections). Ohio has a measure that reaffirms the rights of property owners along the Great Lakes Water Compact area. Oregon has a measure that would exempt projects costing less than $35,000 from having a building permit, and Louisiana has a constitutional amendment concerning the disposition of blighted property.

- Public employees. Conservatives who have viewed with the alarm the growing political influence of employee unions, particularly in the public sector, continue to promote measures to weaken the unions. In Colorado, Amendment 47 would establish a right to work, prohibiting employers from requiring union membership or payment of union dues, Amendment 48 would prohibit deduction of union dues from employee paychecks, and Amendment 54 would prohibit unions and other entities doing business with the state from making campaign contributions. A measure in Oregon would prohibit the political use of union dues — a similar measure was rejected by voters in 2000 by a 10 percent margin. South Dakota's Initiated Measure 10, which would prohibit government employees from contributing to campaigns, is probably unconstitutional. Measures restricting the use of union dues have been unsuccessful in the past, with the most notable failure being California Gov. Pete Wilson's Proposition 226 in 1998.
- Bonds. Ballot propositions continue to ask voters to use debt to finance public projects. In 2006, voters approved 16 of 16 bond measures, including five in California that authorized $43 billion in borrowing. In November, there are 15 bond measures in eight states (AK, AR, CA, ME, NM, OH, PA, RI) that propose a total of $18,561,920,000 of borrowing. California voters will decide four propositions worth a total of $16.83 billion, for high speed trains ($9.95 billion), alternative energy ($5 billion), children's hospitals ($980 million), and aid for veterans ($900 million).
- Suicide. Washington's I-1000, Death with Dignity, would establish the right for a terminally ill patient to commit suicide with the help of a doctor. The campaign for this measure is being led by former Gov. Booth Gardner, a Parkinson's sufferer. Oregon narrowly adopted a similar measure in 1994. A recent poll shows the measure comfortably ahead 52-25.

STATE-BY-STATE LIST

The remainder of this report contains a list of ballot propositions that have qualified to appear on state ballots in 2008. An “initiative” is a citizen-sponsored law that is placed on the ballot by petition.

Alabama

All six measures are constitutional amendments placed on the ballot by the legislature. Amendments 2-6 apply only to a local government.

Both measures were placed on ballot by legislature.

- Constitutional Amendment A. Oath of office. Updates.
- Constitutional Amendment B. Initiative petitions. Changes geographic dispersion requirement to 15% of voters in 2/3 of state senate districts (from counties), presumably makes signature collection more difficult because there are more senate districts.

Twenty-one propositions were decided earlier in the year.

The following propositions were decided by voters in elections held earlier this year.

Alaska (August 26)

All four measures were initiatives.

- Ballot Measure 1. Gambling. Authorizes lotteries and casino games. FAILED 39-61
